I love that - it really does feel like walking into their most intimate space, you know?! To me, I just love the feeling of your website as art, or your website as almost... resistance from the templates, a willingness to create a very specific container for what you put out into the world.

my parents blogged throughout my childhood and made me a blog for my own use when i was eight (my dad is a software&web designer). I don't use it anymore but I've recently been reconnecting to those roots, and there's something about having a personal internet space where I share my thoughts and experiences that social media like instagram can't compare to. substack and tumblr are nice, but still lack something.

lately I've been spending hours looking at neocities sites—they're so creative and ...
